Law Student of the Year

The National Jurist named Sarah Saint (JD '17) as one of 25 “Law Students of the Year” in its second-annual listing published in March. It is the second time in as many years that a Wake Forest Law student has received this recognition. Saint, who served as the Pro Bono Project’s executive director among other leadership roles, was the only law student from a North Carolina law school to be featured on the list.

From the Dean

Dear Brother and Sister Wake Forest Law Alumni,

As the dog days of summer wind down, I find myself reflecting on our wonderful law school's storied past and promising future. In the following pages you will find a brief history of Wake Forest Law as well as a look at what lies ahead. We tell some of these stories through our distinguished faculty—their excellence in the classroom and their trailblazing lives and research. We tell others through our alumni—their high standards of character and their exceptional legal skills. We tell others through our students—who continue to reflect the best of the tradition of Wake Forest Law and its embrace of the future.

Speaking of the best of Wake Forest tradition, surely you have heard by now how our students and their coaches smashed records this year in advocacy competitions. We are the only law school in history to win in the same year both the National Moot Court Competition and one of the two national trial team competitions—the National Student Trial Advocacy Competition of the American Association for Justice (AAJ).

Both of our national trial teams have been knocking on the door of first place. For the third consecutive year, both the AAJ team and our National Trial Team won the regionals of their competitions. For two of the past three years of the AAJ regionals, the finals have pitted two Wake Forest Law teams against each other. And for the second year in a row, Wake Forest Law is one of only 16 schools across the country to compete in the Tournament of Champions for the law schools with the best trial advocacy records. In this edition of the Jurist, you'll read about these amazing student advocates and their dedicated, talented coaches.

In another repeat, the National Jurist magazine for the second year in a row recognized a Wake Forest Law student as one of 25 students nationwide who deserved the title, "Law Student of the Year." I knew Huntsville, Alabama-native Sarah Saint (JD '17) was special the day I met her at orientation. Three years later as the law school's Executive Director of the Pro Bono Project, she led our student body to log more than 6,150 hours (or 256 days worth of pro bono work) throughout the academic year.

We celebrate these student achievements while remaining focused on their experiences at graduation and beyond. One important marker measures the number of students employed 10 months after graduation in jobs for which a JD was required or for which a JD was an advantage. In that category, the percentage of Wake Forest Law students employed was the 10th highest percentage point nationwide. That employment figure helped fuel another rise in the rankings of U.S. News & World Report—to the 36th spot. The latest rankings of USNWR also ranked our Health Law and Policy and our Legal Analysis, Research and Writing (LAWR) programs at 23rd and 24th in the country.

Part of our future involves bringing law to the world—teaching law to new, eager audiences. Our wholly online Master of Studies in Law (MSL), for mid-career professionals who are not pursuing the JD, helps these professionals become more valuable in the workplace. The MSL, with tracks in health law and human resources, is adding new tracks while offering groundbreaking courses. For example, in the health law track, our MSL students may elect to take the first telemedicine course of its kind.

On a personal note, one highlight allowed me to participate on a panel at the Library of Congress with two friends, U.S. Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Associate Dean of International Affairs Dick Schneider. Organized by Dean Schneider, the panel heard the mock appeal of Shylock as he railed against the injustice of his treatment by the imposter trial judge, Portia. Read more about this experience of a lifetime and the role played not only by Dean Schneider and me but also by a Wake Forest alumnus.

What a year it has been—and what a moving way to end it. I know you read all your emails from Wake Forest Law School so you know that this year, we broke another record as you responded to the challenge to “Make It A Million” for the Wake Forest Law Fund. We made it a million. Not only do you hire our graduates, coach trial teams, hear practice rounds, mentor our students, invite them for internships, you also support us financially, an increasingly important part of being a Wake Forest Law graduate. For all of you and all you do, please accept my heartfelt thanks.

We have a lot to celebrate. I hope you will make plans to join Hoppy Elliot and me for a celebratory toast at our fourth annual all Law Alumni Weekend on Nov. 17-18.

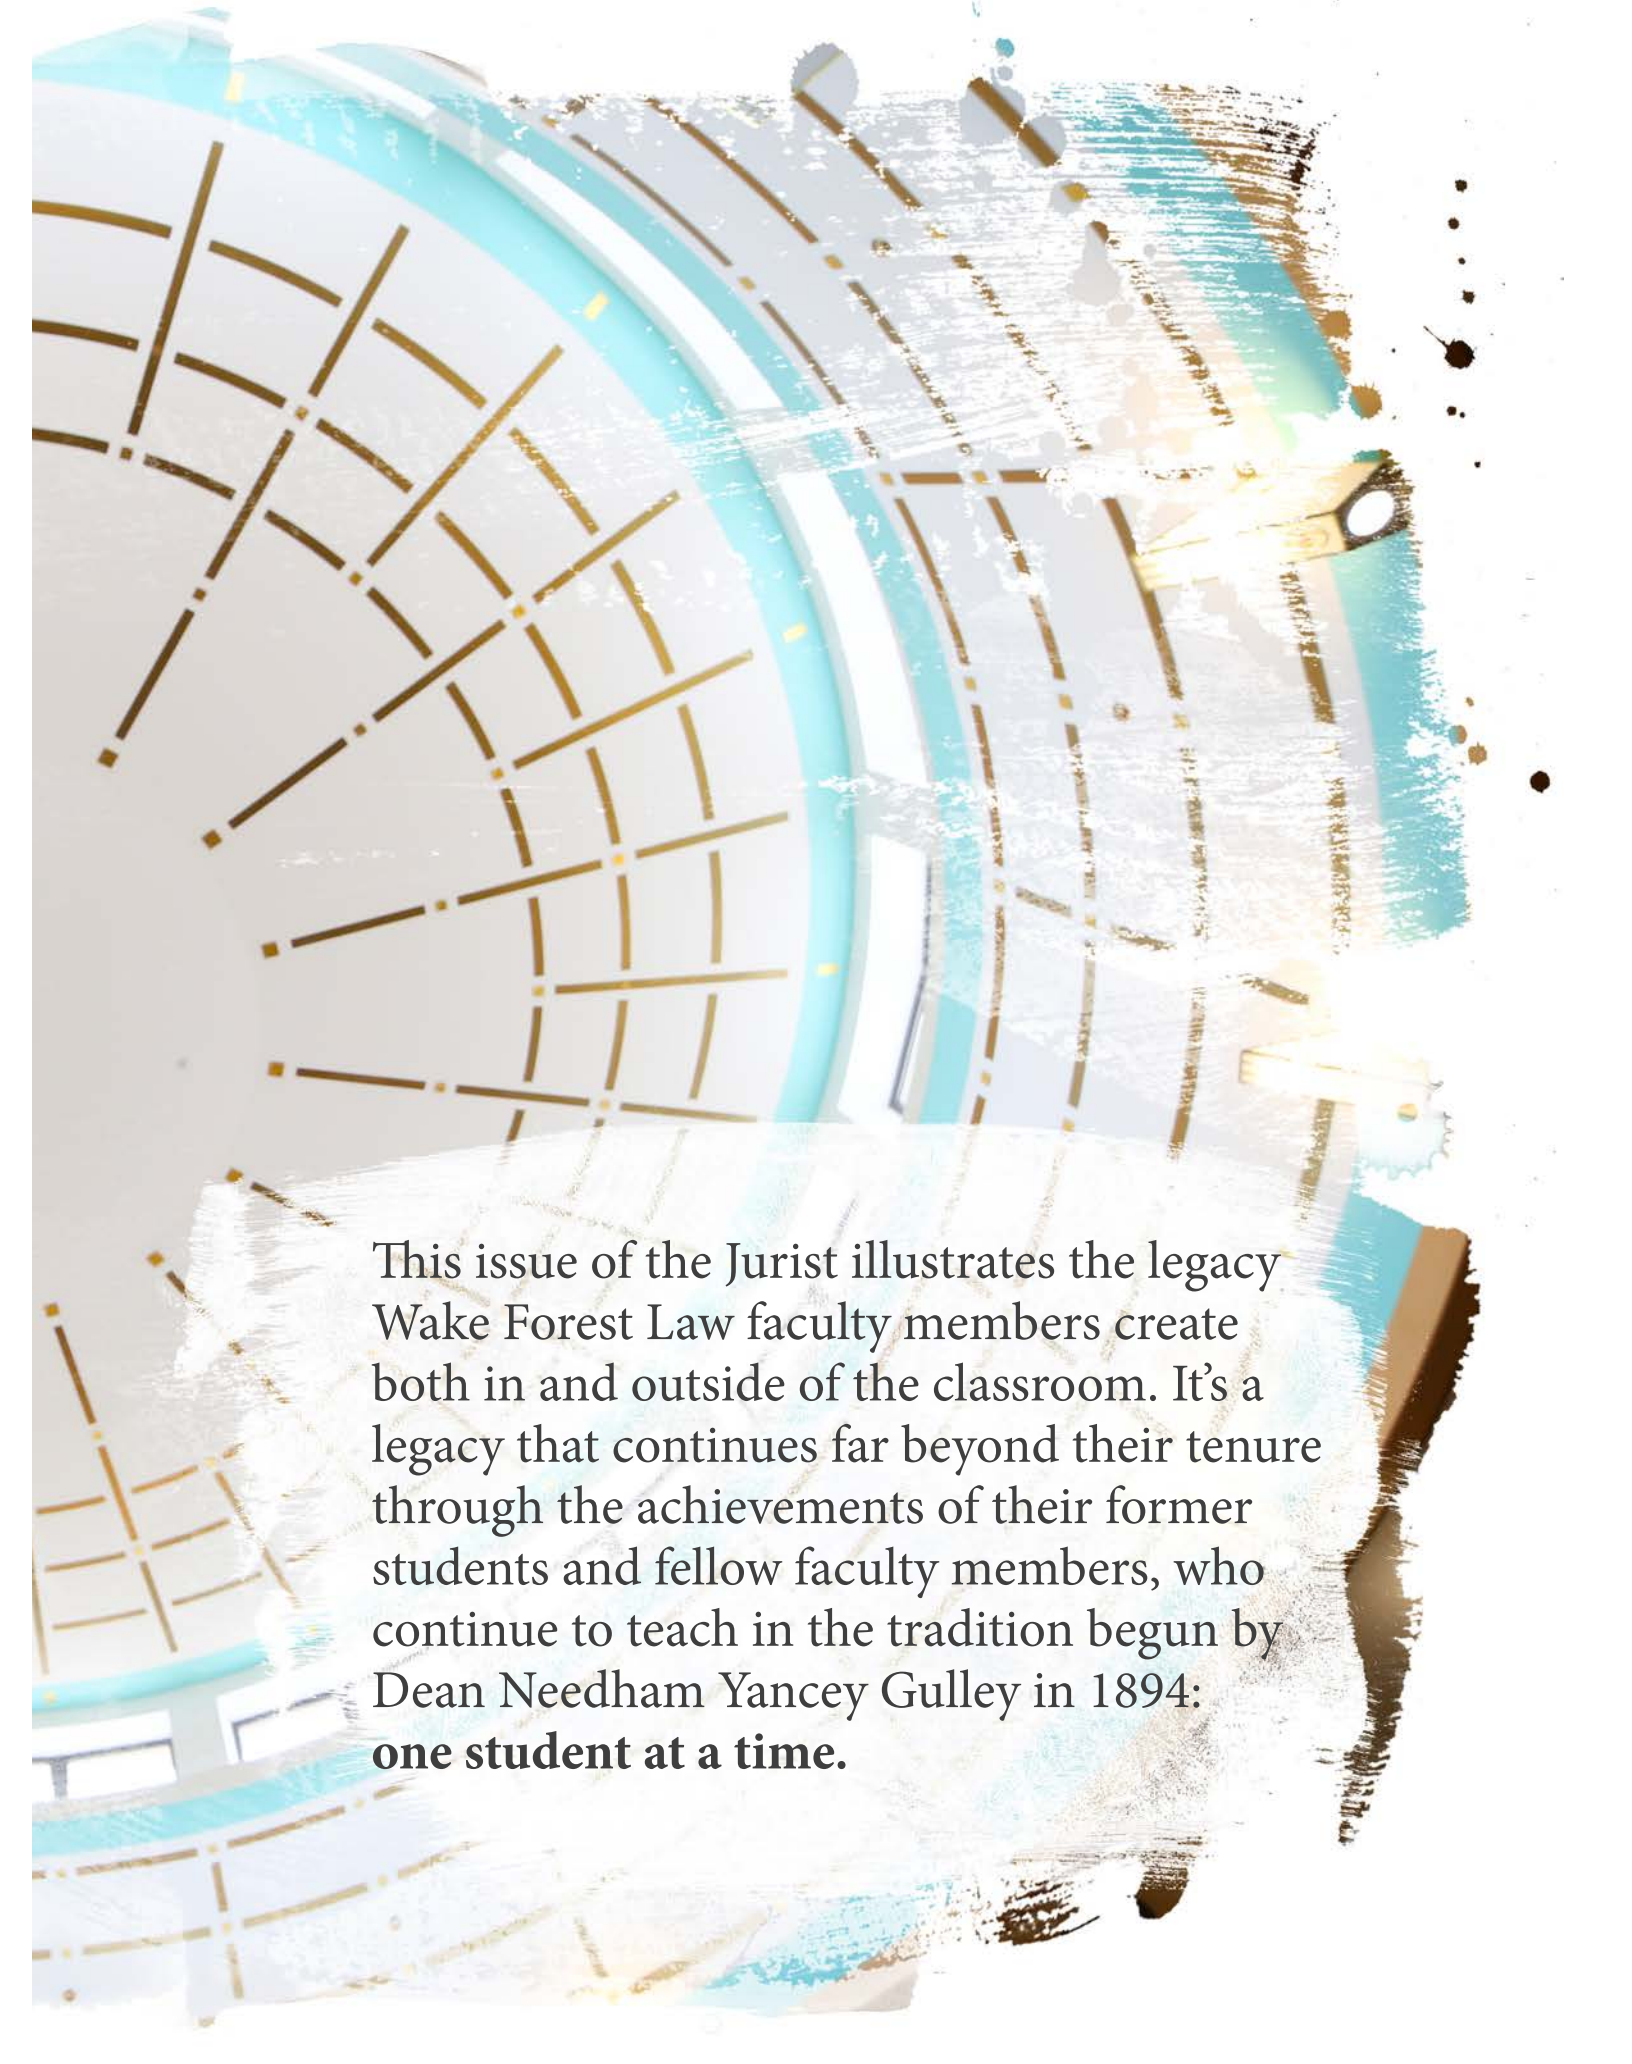

With pride and gratitude for your continued support,

This issue of the Jurist illustrates the legacy Wake Forest Law faculty members create both in and outside of the classroom. It's a legacy that continues far beyond their tenure through the achievements of their former students and fellow faculty members, who continue to teach in the tradition begun by Dean Needham Yancey Gulley in 1894: one student at a time.

LEADER

A Rise to National Prestige

"TO MAKE WAKE FOREST MORE OF A NATIONAL LAW SCHOOL WITHOUT CHANGING THAT BASIC CHARACTER OF THE SCHOOL WAS MY BIGGEST MISSION."

When Dean Emeritus and Professor Robert K. Walsh came to Wake Forest Law in 1989, he says the biggest challenge was to not throw the baby out with the bath water.

"Wake Forest has an intense sense of community of students, faculty and alumni. It's like an extended family," he says. "They also value education, not just the skills of being a lawyer. To make Wake Forest more of a national law school without changing that basic character of the school was my biggest mission."

Twenty-eight years later, 18 of which he served as dean, Walsh remains widely recognized as one of the leaders in legal education in the United States. He stepped down as dean in 2007 and plans to retire on Jan. 31, 2018.

"I am thrilled to say we've kept the tradition of small classes and faculty who are great classroom teachers who like to relate to students outside the classroom and who care about not just the skills of being a lawyer but the values of professionalism."

Walsh adds his greatest legacy, however, is the faculty and staff he left behind, most of whom remain. When he joined as dean, the law school had no endowed chairs or professorships. That changed under Professor Walsh's leadership. "When I left we had four chairs and three endowed professorships," he remembers. He is also very proud of the dramatic increase in scholarship aid for students during his deanship.

Besides directing the rise of Wake Forest Law into national prominence, Walsh has served as the chairperson of the American Bar Association's Section of Legal Education and Admissions to the Bar, which is the accrediting authority for all law schools, and has chaired its two major committees, the Accreditation Committee and the Standards Review Committee.

In 2010, the ABA gave its national Robert J. Kutak Award to Walsh as the person who "meets the highest standard of professional responsibility and demonstrates substantial achievement towards increased understanding between legal education and the active practice of law." Past winners of the Kutak Award have been practicing lawyers, academics and judges, including U.S. Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Since stepping down as dean, Walsh continues to teach. "Students praise his teaching, appreciating his practical wisdom in the law of Evidence, his insights as a seasoned trial lawyer in Federal Courts and his principled explanations of the separation of powers in Con Law II," said Dean Suzanne Reynolds (JD '77).

Dean Reynolds continued, “Bob Walsh has always been one of my most trusted colleagues. For the many years I was a faculty member while he was dean, I valued him for his high standards of civility and character. When I found myself as one of his successors, I turned to him again and again for counsel and guidance. He always responded quickly to every issue, offering his quiet reassurance that he would always be there for me and for the law school to which he has been totally devoted for much of his professional life.”

That indomitable loyalty extends to his wife, Kathie, and to their four children and four grandchildren, Dean Reynolds added.

“While he will continue to represent Wake Forest Law at various professional events, his desire to spend more time with his family will make his retirement effective this coming January. For Bob Walsh’s extraordinary service to this law school, to the legal profession, and to the legal academy, join me in hardy congratulations and well wishes to Bob and Kathie Walsh.”

And while there is no question Walsh will be remembered for an illustrious legal career full of accomplishments, his colleagues say what they recall most fondly is his penchant for singing, whether on the bus to faculty retreats or belting out “Climb Every Mountain” at his last Hooding Ceremony.

TAXMAN

A Lifetime of Scholarship and Tax Law

Professor Joel Newman has dedicated more than 40 years of service to Wake Forest School of Law. Despite his many years of legal practice and pedagogy, legal studies were not always in his plans.

“I wanted to improve cities,” Newman says.

As an American Civilization major at Brown University in the mid-60s, Newman discovered an interest in community development from the works and advocacy of Jane Jacobs. He soon after landed a job with the Redevelopment Authority of New York City with the aspiration to continue his studies in city planning or architecture. Friends and colleagues encouraged him to do otherwise.

“They told me that the heads of city planning agencies in almost all of the major cities were lawyers,” Newman recalls. “They said if you really want to do something to have an impact, you’d better get a law degree. So I did.”

"I LIKE EXPLAINING THINGS. I MUCH PREFERRED TO HAVE A CLIENT WHO WOULD SAY TO ME, 'EXPLAIN HOW THIS WORKS,' AND I THOUGHT, 'WELL, IT WOULD BE MORE FUN TO DO THAT FULL-TIME.'"

Newman began his legal education at the University of Chicago Law School during a turbulent time in American history.

"When people ask me to share my law student experiences, they often can't relate," Newman says. "The Vietnam War was going on, and there has not been anything like that since. Half of my entering class didn't graduate because they either went to Canada or were drafted."

Despite the unrest and threat of the draft, Newman graduated in 1971. He began practicing business law, and soon discovered a passion for tax law and education.

"I like explaining things," Newman says. "I much preferred to have a client who would say, 'explain how this works,' and I thought it would be more fun to do that full time."

Shortly after, Newman received an offer to teach tax law at a small, private law school in the foothills of North Carolina.

He remembers his first flight to Winston-Salem as if it were yesterday, recalling how the green landscape of the Piedmont deeply contrasted with the snowy streets of Minneapolis.

"We broke through the clouds to land in North Carolina. I saw this lush greenery and that did it," he says.

He joined Wake Forest Law in 1976.

Since then, Newman has become a globally-recognized scholar of tax law, having provided consultations to several countries including Uzbekistan, the Ukraine and Slovakia through the American Bar Association's Central and Eastern European Law Initiative (CEELI).

Newman has come to see himself as a writer and an educator, one who has become a better teacher through the process of scholarship.

"The best way to learn is through scholarship," Newman says. "One of the things I like to do most in my scholarship is to tell stories. When you're talking tax, you're talking political stories. When we get to a particular tax subject in class, I'll tell them the political story behind it."

Newman has shaped many memories with students and alumni, memories that are arguably immortalized in one large, stuffed 600-pound gorilla.

"One of my courses is International Tax," Newman says. "When teaching that course, I tend to rail about the arrogance of the U.S. Treasury Department. We're the big guy in the room, so the U.S. Treasury is the 600-pound gorilla. I guess I said that once too often, so one year, my students chipped in to get me a gorilla."

Newman retired from Wake Forest Law on July 1, 2017. When he is not chasing his ideas and thoughts through scholarship and storytelling, Newman is spending time with his family, and playing jazz music.

He and his wife, Jane, have been married for 47 years. They have two children, Bryce and Becky, and three grandchildren—Jack, Juno and Nora. He and Jane routinely dress up in outrageous costumes for Jack and Juno's themed birthday parties, and they play hide-and-seek with Nora every Friday.

ADMIRAL

Inspiring a Passion for International Law

Professor George Walker is remembered by many of his former students for using the “simulation” method for his Civil Procedure courses, a method adapted for the classroom.

“I would begin by asking if anybody wants to do clinic, and they mostly all did,” he recalled, adding he did not use this method in his sit-down seminar courses. “I then handed out Classroom Standards, which published citations to the local rules of state and federal courts, all of which required standing to address a jury or to address the court. It was a way of trying to bring realism to the law school experience from the start.”

Walker also did a cost analysis for students in his Civil Procedure courses to illustrate how much money was riding on every class minute.

“I noted that if a student was wasting everyone’s time showing he or she was not prepared after my inquiry, that was a waste of everyone’s money, as well as the sunk cost of the class represented by alumni gifts. Students could submit unprepared slips before class got started, up to three a semester. The goal was not intimidation but realism for those considering trial work, and underscoring the ethics of wasting time of others.”

Former and current students remember Walker as being tough but fair, generous with his time and advice, but as one put it, “He hid his heart for the students well.” Others credit him with being the inspiration behind why they chose to practice international and corporate law. “While he terrified the 1Ls, 2Ls and 3Ls respected him because they knew he had their best interest at heart,” says Francie Scott (JD ’04), director of the law school’s Office of Career and Professional Development.

Walker, the Dean’s Research Professor of Admiralty and International Law, is celebrating his 45th year as an educator at Wake Forest Law. Upon his planned retirement on July 1, 2018, the university will confer on him the title of University Professor Emeritus of Admiralty and International Law. He will spend the 2017-18 academic year on sabbatical leave representing the university and law school and will represent the law school as University Professor Emeritus following his retirement.

Walker joined the Wake Forest Law community in 1972. He has played a key role in international, national and state legislative and rule drafting projects. He focused initially at Wake Forest on the legal writing course, beginning a tradition of excellence in the legal research and writing program. The first adviser for the Moot Court program, Walker’s efforts in advocacy led also to the the law school’s first clinic, the Appellate Advocacy Clinic, one of the first appellate clinics in the country. Honoring this history, in 1998, the

WAS A WAY OF
TRYING TO BRING
REALISM TO THE

EXPERIENCE FROM THE START.”

Moot Court Board named the first-year moot court competition after him to recognize his long-standing support.

During 1992-93 he was appointed as the Charles H. Stockton Professor of International Law at the Naval War College, Newport, Rhode Island. The Navy awarded the College faculty and staff the Meritorious Unit Commendation, the highest Navy award for shore installations for 1992-93.

At the age of 55, Professor Walker took up painting and donates watercolors to the annual auction of the law school's Public Interest Law Organization (PILO), helping to raise money to send law students to summer internships. He and his wife, Phyllis, have two children and four grandchildren.

"Even in my short time as dean, I've heard alumnus after alumna share their gratitude for Professor Walker's special place in their professional development," said Dean Suzanne

Reynolds (JD '77). "Alumni speak of Professor Walker in the fondest of terms, acknowledging how much he invested in their legal education and in their development as good citizens and good people."

GROUND BREAKER

Piecing Together Obscurities in Funeral and Cemetery Law

Their eyes were attentive to the tombstones basking in the Nebraska sunlight. Nearly hidden among the grasslands were the names of people passed, and with them the mysterious connections that quietly existed between the viewers and the dead.

Professor Tanya Marsh was in her late teens the first time her footsteps followed her grandmother's on burial grounds. It was along a path her grandmother knew well, having spent each Memorial Day of her life navigating the graves of distant relatives with flowers in hand.

These trips continued with Marsh cataloguing the names, births and deaths of her grandfather's people, an endeavor that eventually led her to the county courthouse to piece together her faded family history.

"It was this big puzzle," Marsh recalls. "They were all farmers, so I was basically trying to reconstruct a family tree from real estate and probate records."

Only a few years later, Marsh would find herself in law school with intentions to specialize in trusts and estates, an interest that sprouted in cemetery grass and grew from historical threads rooted in the narrative of property law. A bookish passion for history would continue after graduation and lead Marsh to new legal territories.

"When I was practicing commercial real estate law, I would read old common law cases for fun," she says. "I started reading cases about cemeteries and it became another giant puzzle I needed to solve."

To Marsh, there was a legal framework of oddities and obscurities, a roadmap of missing stories that had at once established funeral and

"I STARTED
READING
CASES ABOUT
CEMETERIES AND IT
BECAME ANOTHER
GIANT PUZZLE I NEEDED TO SOLVE."

Above: Tanya Marsh interviews New York Times best-selling author Caitlin Doughty, a funeral director and well-known voice in the Death Positivist movement, as part of Wake Forest Journal of Law and Policy's February symposium, "Disrupting the Death Care Paradigm: Challenges to the Regulation of the Funeral Industry and the American Way of Death."

cemetery law and remained hidden among statutes and common law doctrines.

Marsh sees the innovative appeal of funeral and cemetery law, noting the antithetical fracture between our own cultural avoidance of death and the law's faint whisper of memento mori.

"People die every day. Cemeteries are all around us. If it wasn't for the deep death-denying trend in our culture, funeral and cemetery law would be something that we would be more concerned about," she says. "But we just don't want to talk about death, so as a result this important area of law has been completely neglected for the better part of the 20th century."

There is a recognition, or rather a unique foresight on Marsh's part, about the salient impact of current laws on the future of funeral services.

"I think the funeral services industry is nearing crisis," she says. "Part of the reason that they're approaching a reckoning point is because people are changing their practices. The rise in the cremation rate and interest in greener practices alone results in people spending less money, which means less income for funeral homes."

Beyond that is the ill-fated combination of an aging funeral director population and high barriers of entry into the funeral services industry, Marsh says.

"The legal and regulatory structure has not changed how much it costs to enter and compete in the funeral industry, so people's changing preferences are reducing income while the cost of doing business remains unchanged. Something has to give."

This is particularly problematic for sparsely populated rural areas fraught with a diminishing demand for funeral services.

"Nobody is paying much attention yet, but I think there is going to be huge pressure on the law when the government sees that funeral homes are closing down because legally imposed obligations mean the economics just don't work," Marsh says. "The government is going to have to relax those obligations in order to have a place for bodies to go and for services to happen. If not, we're all going to have bigger problems."

Marsh is a continuing advocate for legal changes to support the future of the funeral services industry, hosting the first-ever symposium on funeral and cemetery law in February 2017 with the support of the Wake Forest Journal of Law and Policy.

HIGHER CALLING

Promoting Higher Education through Social Connections

Professor Omari Simmons (BA '96), Howard L. Oleck Professor of Business Law, brings a unique set of perspectives to scholarship and teaching that are born out of his diverse experiences. Before joining Wake Forest Law in 2006, Simmons worked as a corporate counsel for two multinational corporations with additional experiences as an associate at the law firm of Wilmer Hale in Washington, D.C., and as a clerk for Chief Justice E. Norman Veasey of the Delaware Supreme Court.

As a recognized expert on corporate governance and higher education policy, Simmons is the founder and director of the law school's innovative Business Law Program (BLP). The student-centered program is designed to expand opportunities that strengthen knowledge of business law concepts as well as develop skills to assist professional development and readiness for practice.

During his time as director, Simmons has helped establish a number of initiatives and programs, including the Sager Speaker Series, named for Thomas Sager (JD '76), which has exposed the Wake Forest Law community to distinguished jurists, general counsels and even an NFL general manager. The National Jurist recently recognized Wake Forest Law among the top law schools for business and corporate law.

Many are unaware, however, that Simmons is also the co-founder and executive director of the Simmons Memorial Foundation (SMF), a grassroots nonprofit organization that promotes higher education access for vulnerable students through student-focused services that include mentoring, college advising, campus visits, standardized test preparation and scholarships. SMF alumni have graduated from an impressive list of top colleges and universities, including Wake Forest University, Harvard University and Yale University.

Simmons does not subscribe to the idea that academically successful students will pursue higher education opportunities that align with their potential and therefore require less guidance from high school counselors. According to Simmons, this perception assumes that all high-achieving students have the same college guidance resources and embark on the same college selection process.

"RESEARCH TELLS US THAT HIGHER EDUCATION ATTAINMENT IS NOT SIMPLY A MATTER OF WHAT YOU KNOW. WHO YOU KNOW IS ALSO IMPORTANT."

Above: Omari Simmons interviews Delaware Supreme Court Justice Randy J. Holland as part of the Business Law Program's Sager Speakers Series, named for Thomas Sager (JD '76)

"Research tells us that higher education attainment is not simply a matter of what you know," Simmons says. "Who you know is also important. Underserved populations often lack the social capital—the relationships with college-educated adults, peers, teachers, administrators and counselors—that help bridge the gap between high school and college in an effective and meaningful way. This social capital can serve as a catalyst to help students acquire valuable information, skills and other benefits in the higher education planning and selection process."

Simmons states that the average high school counselor in the United States serves about 460 students. Against this backdrop, SMF provides high quality college guidance and mentoring to vulnerable students who would not ordinarily have access to these types of resources and higher education-related social capital.

Simmons' advocacy for higher education access has subsequently translated into scholarship. He is the author of multiple articles on education access, including "Lost in Transition: The Implications of Social Capital for Higher Education," "For Profits and the Market Paradox" and "Class Dismissed: Rethinking Socio-Economic Status and Higher Education Attainment." He is also the author of the forthcoming book, "College Access from the Ground-Up," published by Rutgers University Press.

Simmons earned his JD from the University of Pennsylvania Law School, where he received the Thouron Award, a postgraduate fellowship for study in the United Kingdom. He went on to earn his Master of Laws from the University of Cambridge with a concentration in International Commercial Law. Simmons is a member of the American Law Institute (ALI) and has received multiple honors in recognition of his efforts promoting higher-education opportunities.

GAMECHANGER

Working to Improve the Justice System

Professor Ron Wright wants to improve the justice system in North Carolina and beyond, one case at a time.

“My hope is that ultimately my research will result in changes in the law and in legal practice,” he says. For several years, his research took him into the offices of prosecutors to interview the newcomers and veteran attorneys working there. “I want to learn about the best ways to develop young prosecutors as professionals,” Wright says. Some of his research on this topic was published in an article titled, “The Cure for Young Prosecutor Syndrome.”

Wright’s prosecutor research also explores the role of elections. He assembled a one-of-a-kind database of thousands of prosecutor election outcomes between 1996 and 2006 and discovered this troubling fact: voters don’t really hold prosecutors accountable. About 95 percent of incumbent prosecutors won re-election, and a remarkable 85 percent ran unopposed in general elections.

More recently, Wright has visited courthouses across North Carolina as part of his research regarding jury selection known as the “Jury Sunshine Project.” His research eventually will generate a database — the first of its kind — of jury selection outcomes in felony trials in all 100 counties of North Carolina.

“I had the motive and the opportunity,” Wright told University of Pittsburgh Law Professor David A. Harris in a recent interview on the radio program, “Criminal (In)Justice.” “I am interested in prosecutors and in who looks over their shoulders, and that includes jurors. I think it’s weird prosecutors get to choose their own bosses.”

Beginning in January 2013, law library faculty member Liz Johnson helped Wright organize dozens of field researchers, professionals and students in the collection of jury data on 1,306 felony jury trials within the North Carolina courts from all 100 counties, for a total of more than 30,000 jury members.

Data gatherers then fanned out across the state to visit clerk’s offices in remote county courthouses. “It turns out, North Carolina has pretty good records on this ... but the numbers we have gathered no one knew before.”

Wright, who is the Needham Yancey Gulley Professor of Criminal Law, says the “Jury Sunshine Project” is at its heart a story about public records. “We had to work hard to know which files to ask for when we showed up at the courthouse.”

Initial results from the research reveal that women and men serve on juries at about the same rate. Results also show some people get removed from jury pools much more often

"MY HOPE IS THAT ULTIMATELY
MY RESEARCH WILL RESULT IN
CHANGES IN THE
LAW AND IN LEGAL PRACTICE."

than others and, according to Wright's findings so far, race appears to be a factor.

Despite being constitutionally improper to use race or gender as the basis for removal from a jury, a judge, prosecutor or defender can knock off any jury member based on trivial factors, such as the color of his/her shirt. According to the project's findings so far, however, judges remove black jurors at a 20 percent higher rate than white jurors, and prosecutors remove twice as many potential black jurors at trial as white jurors. The flip side is true for defense attorneys, who have a 2-1 ratio of removal the other way, the data shows.

"Race has formed the views of the jurors and they (attorneys) know it's going to affect the case," Wright says. "The outcomes show that a jury with more white males is more likely to convict, especially if a black man is on trial. We also found the more black males on the jury, the more defense-friendly the juries are and the more likely to acquit. Black female jurors are also more likely to acquit, but not so with white women."

Wright is also working with Assistant Professor Francis Flanagan of the Wake Forest University Department of Economics. The pair received a grant to support their project entitled, "Do Peremptory Challenges Increase Bias on Juries?" from the Law and Social Sciences Program of the National Science Foundation (NSF) that runs through June 2018.

And working in conjunction with Wake Forest Law Professors Kami Chavis and Gregory Parks, Wright hopes to eventually see similar "Jury Sunshine Projects" pop up at law schools in each of the 50 states.

"Moving forward, we want to look more closely at the data," Wright adds.

OPEN FOR BUSINESS

WFU

Wake Forest Law is home to the most technologically advanced courtroom in the state of North Carolina — and perhaps the United States — thanks to the addition of the newest North Carolina Business Court in January 2017. It also makes Wake Forest Law the only ranked law school in the nation to house such a court.

THIS IS THE COURTROOM OF THE FUTURE.

—Justice Paul M. Newby

“This is the courtroom of the future,” North Carolina Supreme Court Justice Paul M. Newby told the group of dignitaries gathered on Jan. 18 for the formal dedication ceremony of the state’s fourth physical business court. “Because of the nature of the Business Court, we can be innovative.”

The Honorable Michael Robinson, special superior court judge for complex business cases, has chambers, staff and a dedicated business litigation courtroom at the new location in Winston-Salem. The courtroom is in the west wing of the third floor of the Worrell Professional Center, Room 3205.

Because Business Court judges have statewide jurisdiction, they may hold hearings and trials in all 100 counties. That’s why the court has judges, staff and similar facilities in Charlotte, Greensboro, Raleigh and now in Winston-Salem. Currently Wake Forest Law alumni are among those serving as law clerks in all four court locations.

The Winston-Salem court heard its first case—Vogler Reynolda Road, LLC vs. SCI N.C. Funeral Servs. Inc.; 15 CVS 94 (Forsyth County)—on Tuesday, Jan. 10. The Honorable James L. Gale, Chief Business Court Judge, from Greensboro presided.

“We are training lawyers of the future, so we could not be more thrilled. It took visionary, senior leadership to make this happen,” said Dean Suzanne Reynolds (JD ’77) as she introduced Provost Rogan Kersh (BA ’86).

Having the Business Court housed at the law school, Provost

Kersh said, is “an extraordinary opportunity for us to extend what we at Wake Forest do so well — our whole mission, which is to educate remarkable young minds. In this case, future lawyers — they will be a part of this experience and see Judge Robinson, a whole set of lawyers, plaintiffs and the like, do the work of this place. That is an enormous benefit to us and adds to the depth of our gratitude. It is also central to our university’s mission that we contribute to the communities of which we are a part, to the bar, the state, the region, to the city and the Triad region, and to this state. This fourth business court enables us to deepen and extend our community contributions. We know that landmark decisions will be reached here, and we are mighty proud that they will be reached in the Wake Forest courtroom.”

Judge Michael L. Robinson

Judge Marion Warren, director of the N.C. Administrative Office of the Courts (NCAOC), was instrumental in bringing the new court to Wake Forest Law. “This is the courtroom for the future,” he explained. “Here we will litigate, we will have discovery, we will have motions with folks in Charlotte, folks in Raleigh, folks in Belgium, folks in Singapore.

“It is a working courtroom where men and women practicing law for clients at high-stake levels will come and do their business. They will not only hone their craft, they will teach their craft. And not only will they teach their craft, they will be allocating and advocating in front of one of the best benches in the United States. I cannot overemphasize the work of the people who have made this a reality today. The institution that is Wake Forest went out of its way to bring this court to this university and to this city and the vision of the North Carolina General Assembly.”

Judge Robinson added, “I am so excited about being in this space. I have told people and they say, ‘Well how is your court?’ and I say ‘It’s not my court, it’s the state’s court.’ We have digital recordings of our proceedings, we are able, as Judge Warren said, to have people testify live by video conference from anywhere in the world, and we’re looking forward to doing that. We have monitors in the jury box, something that is hard to find anywhere in the United States, especially in North Carolina. Justice will be done here.”

Clerks

Wake Forest Law is the only ranked law school in the country that is also home to a working business court, and Wake Forest Law alumni are working as clerks within each of the four state business court locations in Raleigh, Charlotte, Greensboro and now in Winston-Salem.

Kelly Warlich (JD '16) is the Judicial Law Clerk to the Honorable Michael Robinson at the North Carolina Business Court in Winston-Salem. A native of New Canaan, Connecticut, Warlich majored in psychology at Oberlin College before attending Wake Forest Law. "I have really enjoyed seeing hearings and attorneys' different argument styles, as well as hearing the perspectives of, and learning from, the Business Court judges," she says. Derek Bast (JD '16) is the Judicial Law Clerk to the Honorable Louis A. Bledsoe III at the North Carolina Business Court in Charlotte. Bast, who is originally from Knoxville, Tennessee, studied classical languages and religious studies at Vanderbilt University. A highlight of his clerkship was getting to see a case through to a jury verdict. "Trials are remarkably dynamic compared to the measured process of motion practice," he said. Kaitlin Price (BA '13, JD '16) is the Judicial Law Clerk to the Honorable James L. Gale at the North Carolina Business Court in Greensboro. A native of Albemarle, North Carolina, Price is gaining hands-on litigation experience, increasing her understanding of business law and interacting with some of the state's top business attorneys as part of her clerkship. "After speaking with professors and practicing litigators, I realized that a clerkship was a great way to start my career because I would be able to get hands-on experience with cases early on." Brinson Taylor (JD '15) is the Judicial Law Clerk to the Honorable Greg McGuire at the North Carolina Business Court in Raleigh. Taylor, who previously clerked in the North Carolina Court of Appeals, says he has been surprised by the amount of practical experience he has gained as a business court clerk. His advice to current law students who think they want to clerk in the business court? "Start early." Read more at go.wfu.edu/tj7

“ HEARING JUSTICE KENNEDY USE THE CONCEPT OF A ‘PUBLIC SQUARE’ OR JUSTICE GINSBURG REFER TO THE ‘MARKETPLACE OF IDEAS’ IN THE MODERN FIRST AMENDMENT SETTING OF THE INTERNET WAS FASCINATING.

Professor John Korzen (JD '91)

Members of the Appellate Advocacy Clinic traveled to Washington, D.C., to observe an oral argument at the U.S. Supreme Court and then had the extreme honor of meeting with Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg on Feb. 27, 2017, says Professor John Korzen (JD '91), clinic director.

The clinic members attended the oral argument in Packingham v. North Carolina, a case involving a First Amendment challenge to a North Carolina statute. The petitioner was convicted of violating a state statute that prohibits all registered sex offenders from accessing any commercial social media websites that minors can join even if their convictions had nothing to do with the internet. The petitioner was convicted of violating the law after he noted on Facebook that he had had a traffic ticket dismissed and praised God. The clinic submitted an amicus brief on behalf of three organizations that support the petitioner’s First Amendment rights.

“The oral argument was outstanding,” Professor Korzen said. “Hearing Justice Kennedy use the concept of a ‘public square’ or Justice Ginsburg refer to the ‘marketplace of ideas’ in the modern First Amendment setting of the internet was fascinating.”

After the day’s arguments, clinic members met with Justice Ginsburg, who graciously answered numerous questions on a variety of topics, including memorable cases she has worked on, who inspired her as a writer and her advice for 3Ls about to enter the legal profession.

Clinic member Malorie Letcavage (JD '17) is incredibly grateful to have the opportunity not only to hear an oral argument that the Appellate Advocacy Clinic had some part in, but to be able to meet Justice Ginsburg.

“Meeting Justice Ginsburg in person affirmed all the reasons I wanted to be a lawyer in the first place. She is proof that if you work hard and advocate for what you believe in, you can make a difference.”

STEPPING UP

U.S. Army Capt. Florent “Flo” Groberg presented, “Opportunities Earned and Leadership Learned: An American Hero’s Journey,” on March 15 in the Worrell Professional Center. The event was co-sponsored by Bank of America in an effort to raise financial support and student engagement for the Veterans Legal Clinic. Capt. Groberg made a similar presentation later that day at the Wake Forest University Charlotte Center, where he was introduced by former U.S. Marine Corps Capt. Brandon Heffinger (JD ’14).

“When a country is not providing services to veterans that it should, great law schools have to step up,” Dean Suzanne Reynolds (JD ’77) said. The Veterans Legal Clinic provides legal assistance to North Carolina veterans, reservists and active duty personnel. The clinic is operated by six to eight students who handle two to three cases each semester.

“I am not a veteran, but I’m a daughter and granddaughter of a veteran and a friend of very many,” Charlee Fox (JD ’17) said. “I am so eager and humbled to work with veterans. The Veterans Legal Clinic allows me to become a better attorney for veterans in the future and a better daughter to the veterans in my life now.”

Capt. Groberg received the Medal of Honor in 2015 for his heroic actions in Afghanistan. When he arrived in Afghanistan’s Konar province, he noticed a suspicious man backpedaling toward the Army patrol. Groberg grabbed the man by the chest and threw him on the ground before his bomb detonated. The suicide bomber killed four men and injured several others, but Groberg survived with life-threatening injuries to his left leg.

After 33 surgeries and struggling with Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD), Groberg has a new appreciation for life.

“We wear that uniform ready for the ultimate sacrifice,” Groberg said. “Now I live every day to the best of my ability.”

Many veterans suffer from PTSD and/or Traumatic Brain Injury (TBI), and approximately 20 veterans commit suicide daily. The Veterans Legal Clinic is working with veterans in the community to upgrade their discharge paperwork, allowing them to receive greater benefits. Through their pro bono work, students taking the clinic, under the supervision of a licensed attorney, are making an impact.

“I’m really amazed by the Veterans Legal Clinic; these are great people volunteering and leading,” Groberg added.

HOW THE CLINIC HELPS

By Brandon Heffinger (JD '14)
Veterans Legal Clinic Adjunct Professor

When service members leave the military, whether at the end of their commitment or following disciplinary action, they are given a discharge with an accompanying characterization. Discharges classified as other than honorable, bad conduct, dishonorable, or, in some cases, general are called “bad-paper” discharges, and they preclude veterans from many, if not all, benefits. Veterans who feel they were unfairly given a “bad-paper” discharge can petition to upgrade their characterization.

There are hundreds of thousands of veterans with “bad-paper” discharges. For example, although studies estimate that 30 percent of Vietnam War veterans suffered from Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder, the condition was not medically diagnosed until 1980, and the Department of Defense did not instruct Discharge Review Boards to give liberal consideration to PTSD and TBI in upgrade petitions until 2014.

In late 2016, Congress passed a new law, requiring Boards for Correction of Military Records and Naval Records to also give liberal consideration to PTSD and TBI in upgrade petitions. Additionally, as many as 100,000 service members received “bad-paper” discharges for homosexuality between World War II and the 2010 repeal of the “don’t ask, don’t tell” policy.

The Wake Forest Veterans Legal Clinic assists veterans with discharge upgrade petitions. As a law student, I conceived the clinic and worked with Professor Steven Virgil to develop the program. With the assistance of several other law students, the clinic was launched in 2015.

Law students enroll in the clinic for credit, and, in addition to attending a weekly seminar, directly represent veterans with discharge upgrade petitions and advocate for pro-veteran policies. The clinic is in the process of filing its first batch of discharge upgrade petitions.

NATIONAL CHAMPIONS

BY MIA FALZARANO (JD '17)
AND LIBBY CASALE (JD '18)

It has been an exciting year for oral and written advocacy at Wake Forest Law. The National Moot Court Team and American Association for Justice (AAJ) Trial Team both had success on the national stage. Within two months, the two teams won their respective national competitions, a feat that no other law school has accomplished.

The National Moot Court competition completed its 67th year and is the country's oldest interscholastic moot court tournament. This year was the fifth time in eight years that a Wake Forest team advanced from its regional competition to the national level, with Wake Forest having "four-peated" as a regional champion. For the second time, Wake Forest won the National Championship, the first being in 1986, when a team composed of the Class of 1987's Scott Lovejoy, Donna Sisson and Karen Williamson, coached by Professor Charley Rose, won the competition.

This year's National Moot Court team was comprised of Matt Cloutier, (JD '17), Mia Falzarano (JD '17) and Blake Stafford (JD '17). The coach was Professor John Korzen (JD '91).

The moot court team brought home all "the hardware" at the national finals, which were held in February in New York City. In addition to winning the final round over a team from Ohio State University and thereby earning the championship, the team also won Best Brief (out of the 28 teams in the finals), Best Oralist in the final round (Falzarano) and Second Best oralist in the final round (Stafford). Going 6-0 in the finals (after going 5-0 in the Richmond regional), the team defeated UCLA, South Texas, Minnesota, Chicago-Kent and Tennessee law schools to reach the final round.

Wake Forest's AAJ National Student Trial Advocacy Competition (STAC) was equally successful, bringing home Wake Forest's first national win in a trial competition. Team members—Mia Falzarano (Captain, JD '17), Cheslie Kryst (JD/MBA '17), Drew Culler (JD '17) and Ethan White (JD '17)—led Wake Forest to a decisive victory, under the direction of coach Matt Breeding (JD '06), and were praised for their professionalism and dedication to trial advocacy.

Both the AAJ Trial Team and the National Trial Team have been regional winners for the past three years. During 2016 and 2017, Wake Forest was also the runner-up at the AAJ regional competitions, with one team failing to advance only due to going head-to-head with the other Wake Forest team for a spot in the national competition.

In 2016, the AAJ Trial Team went further at the AAJ Student Advocacy Trial Competition nationals than any other Wake Forest Trial Team had ever gone, placing third in the United States. The 2016 team was comprised of Joshua Bussen (Captain, JD '16), Zabrina Delgado (JD '16), Mia Falzarano (JD '17) and Carson Smith (JD '16), who were under the direction of Breeding and Katie King (JD '12).

These successes would not have been possible without the dedication of coaches Breeding and Korzen, who dedicated countless hours to preparing their students for the competition and life beyond law school. The skills developed through Wake Forest's advocacy programs help bridge the divide between student and attorney. Breeding stated that in the decade he has coached, there has never been a team like the 2017 National Champions, adding the AAJ Team evoked awe in others by demonstrating a combination of intelligence, passion and camaraderie during the competition. Korzen, who has similarly coached the National Moot Court Teams for a decade, said the 2017 National Moot Court Team members had an ideal blend of legal skills, work ethic and professionalism.

“Volunteer coaches devote thousands of hours to our appellate and trial teams,” says Dean Suzanne Reynolds (JD '77). “Because of their devotion, our hard-working students learn invaluable lessons about advocacy skills, professionalism, devotion and commitment. Wake Forest competes and wins against schools with bigger budgets and more personnel, but they never compete against schools with more heart or more talent.”

Justice for Shylock

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsberg leads mock appeal panel at Law Library of Congress

Shylock, the Jewish moneylender in Shakespeare's "The Merchant of Venice," has prevailed—but not for his pound of flesh. In a mock appeal organized by Professor Dick Schneider and hosted by the Library of Congress, the panel of appellate judges decreed that Shylock receive his original loan of 3,000 ducats without his having to convert to Christianity.

U.S. Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg presided over the judges' panel, which included Dean Suzanne Reynolds (JD '77), Schneider, former U.S. Ambassador to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, and Maryland Congresswoman Connie Morella and Micaela del Monte from the European Parliament.

"Justice Ginsburg is fascinated by literature, especially drama, and by the power of literature to give us new perspectives on the lives we lead," Schneider said. "She threw herself into the Shylock appeal with her usual energy and passion, which meant we had a great event."

The performance began where the original play left off: Shylock, who was portrayed by Edward Gero, received nothing of his claim, deprived of all property and sentenced to convert to Christianity.

Michael Klotz (JD '15) of Jones Day of New York advocated on behalf of Shylock, arguing two central issues that arose in the aftermath of the loan contract between Shylock and the merchant of Venice, Antonio. According to Klotz, he was never paid and the trial judge, Portia, imposed criminal penalties on what was a civil contract.

"It can't be the case that when somebody goes to court and asks for justice, that that's a crime," Klotz argued. "So we ask that the judgment be reversed trial, we ask for the money to be returned, we're asking for interest and any relief that the court deems fit."

"There's an unusual feature of this proceeding," Justice Ginsburg pointed out from the bench. "Antonio is surety. The beneficiary of the loan is Bassanio, but you are not suing Bassanio. You brought suit against Antonio."

"That's correct, your honor," Klotz replied. "He was the guarantor on the loan and he was the recipient with the Republic of Venice for the underlying money for this argument."

Eugene D. Gulland of Covington LLP advocated for Antonio, stating that Shylock entered into a “premeditated and deceitful course of action in order to lure Antonio into a bond that would be the means of his own destruction.” Emphasizing Shylock’s perceived vengeance plot, he asked the court to uphold its former decision, including the conversion sanction.

“[Shylock] was laying a trap,” Gulland claimed. “He understood that he would probably be repaid, but he also understood, that if he were not, this would be his opportunity to finally have the revenge that he sought so dearly.”

The appellee counsel also included Professor Teresa Miguel-Stearns of Yale Law School, who argued on behalf of Portia, seeking to discharge the heroine from the case and from future-related proceedings.

“Portia is the wrong defendant appellee in this case,” Miguel-Stearns said. “Portia’s alleged misrepresentations to the court and alleged interests in the outcome of this matter are without merit, or at most, harmless error.”

Miguel-Stearns noted that gender discrimination played a role in the appellee’s actions, citing that “pretending to be a judge was her way to advance her career as lawyer.”

At the conclusion of the appeal, Portia, too, was exonerated and dismissed from further proceedings.

“Teresa Miguel-Stearns, you were such a wonderful advocate for your client,” Reynolds said from the bench. “I hope you tell her that I think she would be a really wonderful candidate for admission to Wake Forest law school.”

Although Shylock was not granted interest, the Court annulled his conversion as a substitutional remedy and dismissed the Alien Statute that formerly stripped Shylock of his property.

“What a wonderful homework assignment: re-read “The Merchant of Venice” to prepare to share the appellate bench with Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg,” said Dean Reynolds. “The evening had all the magic of Shakespeare and the brilliance of Justice Ginsburg.”

“Justice for Shylock” was performed on June 21 as part of a series of events sponsored by the Law Library of Congress commemorating the 500th Anniversary of the founding of the Jewish Ghetto in Venice. This event marks the second mock appeal for Shylock organized by Schneider. The first was staged in Venice during the summer of 2016. Both performances featured Justice Ginsburg as the presiding judge.

The full performance can be watched on YouTube at bit.ly/JusticeForShylock.

Citizens of the World

Wake Forest Law boasts a robust LL.M. program, welcoming students from across the globe to study law in Winston-Salem, North Carolina, each year. The JD Mentor Program partners LL.M. students with current JD students to provide assistance in adjusting to a new culture, language and education.

Each fall, JD student volunteers are paired with a new LL.M. student based upon their backgrounds, interests and languages spoken. It was through this program that Kintaro Minami (LL.M. '17) and Ray Dunn (JD '18) met and forged a strong friendship.

“My life in law school became more comfortable after I met Ray, my mentor, in the beginning of fall semester,” said Minami, who hails from Japan. “Once you make a friend that you can talk with about your experience in law school, you feel better.”

JD student mentors offer guidance on cultural issues and answer questions about class requirements, law school exams and study practices. They also help welcome their LL.M. mentees into the social aspects of the law school community.

“It was very beneficial because (my mentor) had a long career in Japan,” Minami said. “I could ask questions about jobs in Japan as well as in the U.S. Maybe you and your mentor will have something in common. If you want to talk, need help or have lunch, your mentor will give you time and you can share your experiences with him or her.”

The program benefits the mentor as well. JD students form relationships with international students, and with them, an increased knowledge of world affairs.

“I signed up to be a mentor because I thought it would be a great opportunity to develop a mutually beneficial relationship with an attorney from another country,” Dunn said. “(The LL.M.s) bring an invaluable opportunity to share unique perspectives through mutually beneficial cross-cultural communication. And this not only makes us better lawyers, but better citizens of the world.”

Pro Bono Project establishes Family Preparedness Project

By Vanessa Garrido (JD '18) and Emily Scotton (JD '18)

Bilingual Wake Forest Law students volunteered during the spring semester in the Family Preparedness Project, a new initiative led by the Pro Bono Project that seeks to provide durable powers of attorney for individuals in North Carolina who may be at risk of deportation. Student coordinators, Emily Scotton (JD '18) and Vanessa Garrido (JD '18), organized client appointments at the Downtown Health Plaza in Winston-Salem over the course of four evenings in April.

Using a training module and a forms packet provided by the North Carolina Justice Center, law students met with immigration clients to prepare documents under the supervision of local volunteer attorneys, including Dean Suzanne Reynolds (JD '77).

“For me, participating in this project gave a face—actually, two faces—to the immigration debate,” Dean Reynolds says. “Through student translators, I talked with a mother and father anxious to provide for their children in the event they had to leave this country without their children. These parents, my clients, brightened as they executed the documents, and I felt a part of something really important.”

These documents included durable powers of attorney, power of attorney to make educational decisions about children, authorization to consent to health care for a minor and a DMV power of attorney. “We are ecstatic that we were able to serve so many people,” Scotton said. “Now 17 individuals have the peace of mind that comes from having these documents.”

The Downtown Health Plaza is a frontline provider of primary care to the medically underserved in Winston-Salem.

Professor Margaret Taylor who served as the faculty adviser to the Family Preparedness Project, says, “It was gratifying to establish a partnership with colleagues at Wake Forest Baptist Health. I am so impressed with the pro bono commitment of our students who eagerly stepped forward to organize and staff this project.”

In addition to the two project coordinators, 12 law students, four local attorneys and Adjunct Professor Helen Parsonage and former Pro Bono Director Beth Hopkins volunteered.

Jessica Bell (JD '05) and Matthew Phillips (JD '06) also generously volunteered their time and estate planning expertise to provide an orientation to project participants and to train student volunteers.

The Project hopes to serve more clients in the 2017-18 academic year by forming relationships with new community partners and expanding their network of volunteer supervising attorneys. If you or your organization are interested in getting involved, please email Professor Taylor at taylormh@wfu.edu.

In Memorium

Dean John 'Don' Scarlett

Dean Emeritus and retired Professor of Law John "Don" Scarlett, 93, died on July 10, 2017, after an extended illness. Dean Scarlett joined the Wake Forest faculty in 1955, one year prior to the college's historic move to Winston-Salem. A teacher of Torts, Constitutional Law and International Law, Dean Scarlett was one of nine faculty members at the law school under the leadership of Dean Carroll Weathers (BA '22, JD '23).

In Washington, D.C., in 1960, Dean Scarlett received a congressional fellowship, the American Political Science Fellowship. He served as counsel for the Senate Judiciary Committee for the next two summers. He left Wake Forest in 1962 to pursue a deanship at the University of South Dakota Law School, and in 1969, at Drake Law School in Des Moines, Iowa.

He returned to Wake Forest Law as dean in 1979. Under his leadership, the law school implemented the 440 Plan to reduce the student/faculty ratio. He also strengthened the school's program of legal writing. As chairman of the National Financial Aid Committee of the Law School Admissions Council, he assisted in the development of the National Access Loan. He retired as dean in 1989.

"All the things we've been doing in the past 10 years have combined to change the public perception of Wake Forest

Law School from essentially a local practitioner oriented school to [an] innovative, still professionally oriented law school with growing national recognition," Dean Scarlett was quoted as saying in the Spring/Summer 1989 issue of the Jurist. "And while we've been doing this we've been trying to maintain the best thing we have going for us — the Wake Forest mystique. One of my personal goals is that as we develop into a national law school we still retain some of the 'good stuff' about Wake Forest."

Dean Suzanne Reynolds (JD '77) noted, "Several of us joined the faculty during the tenure of Dean Scarlett. Individually, we felt his support in our professional development. Collectively, we felt his devotion to preserving the best of Wake Forest traditions while pushing us to embrace our national role in the academy."

1 Hazel Mack began as Wake Forest Law’s new interim director of outreach in October 2016 after 35 years at Legal Aid of North Carolina (LANC). Ann Gibbs, associate dean of Administration and Student Services, said, “We warmly welcome Hazel Mack to the Wake Forest community and are extremely fortunate that she will be overseeing our outreach efforts.” Mack’s office is located in the Smith Anderson Center for Community Outreach, where she works closely with Outreach Coordinator Denise Hartsfield (JD ’91).

2 Wake Forest Law conferred hoods on more than 200 graduates on May 14, including 177 Juris Doctor degree candidates, 17 International Master of Laws in American Law degree (LLM) candidates, nine Master of Studies in Law (MSL) candidates and four Scientiae Juridicae Doctors (SJD) candidates. The school conferred hoods on its first Two-Year International JD graduates — Julia de la Parra and Santiago Herrera of Buenos Aires, Argentina, and Shou Li of Liuzhou, China.

3 The Black Law Students Association (BLSA) celebrated the 32nd annual scholarship banquet inspired by former President Barack Obama’s uplifting slogan, “Yes We Can. Yes We Will,” on Feb. 10. Held at the Winston-Salem Marriott, BLSA members dined with faculty members and alumni and heard a keynote by the Honorable Cheri L. Beasley of the North Carolina Supreme Court. The 2017 recipients of the BLSA Scholarships were Briana O’Neil (JD ’18), Cheslie Kryst (JD ’17), Tracea Rice (JD ’19) and Lhens Vilson (JD ’17). Professor Steve Virgil, executive director of experiential education, received the Legacy Award.

HOT OFF THE PRESS

Professor Shannon Gilreath (JD '02) co-authored a comprehensive textbook, “Sexual Orientation and Identity: Political and Legal Analysis,” with North Carolina Central University School of Law Professor Lydia E. Lavelle. The book uses decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court and lower courts to “trace the development of rights pertaining to sexual orientation and identity.”

Professor Tanya Marsh co-authored a book, “Real Property for the Real World: Building Skills Through Case Study,” with University of Texas Professors Heather Way and Lucille Wood. Published by West Publishing Co., the book shows how the concepts in first-year Property courses work in practice.

Professor Harold Lloyd shepherded the publication of a one-of-a-kind book reproducing Volume 51 of the 2015 Wake Forest Law Review Symposium on Langdell and legal education reform, “Revisiting Langdell: Legal Education Reform and the Lawyer’s Craft.”

Assistant Dean of Instructional Technologies and Design Ellen Murphy (JD '02), director of the Master of Studies in Law degree program, co-authored the textbook, “Professional Responsibility: A Contemporary Approach (3d),” part of a West Academic Publishing Interactive Casebook series.

Professor Joel Newman authored a new book, “A Short and Happy Guide to Federal Income Taxation,” a West Publishing Company publication. The guidebook addresses basic law school income tax course topics such as deductions, capital recovery and mixed motive expenses.

Professor Abigail Perdue’s latest book, “The All-Inclusive Guide to Judicial Clerking,” published by West Academic Publishing, is available on Amazon and was listed as the No. 1 New Release in the Legal Services category.

Professor Omari Simmons, director of the law school’s Business Law Program, authored the book, “College Access from the Ground-Up: Narratives Transformed,” a forthcoming Rutgers University Press publication.

1 From Harbin, China, to Vienna, Austria, to Winston-Salem, North Carolina, the third biennial meeting of the World Tort Law Society will be held Nov. 13-18 at Wake Forest Law. Professor Michael Green, a nationally and internationally recognized torts teacher and scholar, is hosting and helping organize the event as a founding member of the World Tort Law Society. The World Tort Law Society's bi-annual meeting will be held in conjunction with the Wake Forest Law Review's fall symposium Friday, Nov. 17. Both will address the way in which different legal systems address traffic accidents, including bases for tort liability, first and third-party insurance and government social welfare program.

Wake Forest Law's History of Strong Women Leaders Influence Current Student Leaders

By Grace Sykes (JD '17)

In 1966, Rhoda Billings graduated first in her class from Wake Forest University School of Law. She was the only woman.

The same year Billings enrolled in law school, the American Bar Association (ABA) began recording data on gender and law school enrollment. Fifty years after Billings graduated, women make up the majority of students enrolled at ABA-accredited law schools. But Billings is just one remarkable woman in a long line of strong women leaders at Wake Forest Law.

When Dean Suzanne Reynolds (JD '77) enrolled as a student at the law school, Billings was a member of the faculty. Dean Reynolds is an expert in family law and has received countless accolades for her commitment to teaching and public service both nationally, regionally and locally. After practicing for a few years, Dean Reynolds joined the faculty in 1981, was named Executive Associate Dean for Academic Affairs in 2010, interim dean in 2014 and finally dean of the law school in 2015. She is the first woman to lead Wake Forest Law, and joins a minority of ABA-accredited law schools—only 31 percent—that are currently led by women.

These women, and countless others, have inspired women and students to pursue their passions and not be afraid to lead.

In the past two years, female students have stepped up to the challenge including Kayleigh Butterfield (JD '17), who served as the Wake Forest Law Review Editor-in-Chief, a position held by a woman at only 38 percent of Top 50 Law Schools ranked by U.S.

Rhoda Billings (JD '66)

News & World Report. Sarah Saint (JD '17) directed Wake Forest Law's Pro Bono Project and co-chaired OUTLaw, Stephanie Jackson (JD '17) directed the Public Law Interest Organization (PILO), Kyleigh Feehs (JD '17) chaired the Honor Council and Grace Sykes (JD '17) served as president of the Student Bar Association.

Numerous other women lead student organizations at Wake Forest Law, and will attest that the female faculty and staff serve as inspiration. Kendra Stark (JD '17), who led the Federalist Society and the Domestic Violence Awareness Coalition (DVAC), says these women "paved a path that provided us not only the opportunity, but the courage to achieve. Being surrounded by confident, fearless, high-achieving women, both standing at the front of the classroom and sitting in the desk beside me, has forced me to demand more of myself both personally and academically."

The legal profession has historically been dominated by men. For example, total representation of women in both federal and state judgeships is only 27.1 percent. Additionally, as of 2015, women lawyers on average earned roughly only 90 percent of a male attorney's weekly salary.

Janice Johnson (JD '17), who led the Immigration Law Society and served as the Pro Bono Project's Coordinator of Student Organizations and Projects, says one challenge she has faced as a young female professional is establishing credibility. "I was working with a client, a non-profit, and in the final meeting, the chairman of the board felt the need to validate or second everything I said to the rest of the board. It was as if he was reassuring the board that I was correct. I wonder if he would have done if I were male?"

These obstacles force women to strike an almost impossible balance, learning to command respect without causing offense. "I feel like I have to walk a very fine line between being assertive but not (too) assertive," Johnson says.

Jackson adds being surrounded by strong women leaders is "heartening." For her, Wake Forest Law is filled with "professors, administrators and staff who lead by example, utilize an open-door policy for support and empower all students to step up, to lean in and to contribute."

"If you have the vision and the motivation to try and make a difference in the law school community and beyond, the implied question at Wake Forest Law is not, 'why lead?' but 'why not?'"

Members of the "Women in Law" student group are planning an event that will bring together female students, faculty, staff and alumnae at Law Alumni Weekend 2017. Contact Megan Ratley, assistant director of Law Alumni Engagement, for more information at ratleym1@wfu.edu.

STEVE GARLAND (JD '80)

From an afternoon daily newspaper to Charlotte and Winston-Salem law firms to serving as a town attorney, Wake Forest Law Professor of Practice Steve Garland (JD '80) eventually found his way to the classroom.

After 25 years in private commercial law practice, Professor Garland joined the Wake Forest School of Law staff as an adjunct professor in 2006. He became a Professor of the Practice in August 2011 and taught the foundational Master of Studies in Law (MSL) course, "The Workplace: Its Legal Context," as well as Decedents' Estates and Trusts to JDs. Over the years, he also taught Mortgages; Legal Analysis, Writing and Research I and II; and Business Drafting before retiring in 2017.

"To my surprise, I found that standing up and talking in front of a bunch of people was fun; it's sort of like an hour of standup comedy," said Garland, who was not only chosen by the Class of 2017 as the faculty member to speak at Hooding, but also as Teacher of the Year. "You've got to get the information across in an entertaining way because you want the students to come back and actually care about the class."

Garland earned an undergraduate degree from Duke University. Following his brother to Wake Forest Law, he served as the Editor-in-Chief of Wake Forest Law Review. After graduation, he clerked for North Carolina Supreme Court Chief Justice Joseph Branch (JD '38). "It's hard to say, but looking back I would credit that year to being the time I had the most fun as a lawyer," Garland says.

Garland was a private attorney at Moore and Van Allen in Charlotte in the early '80s and then spent most of his legal career in practice at Blanco Tackabery in Winston-Salem. There he specialized in commercial real estate, commercial financing and municipal law, including working on the creation of the Town of Lewisville.

Liz McCurry Johnson, a library faculty member of Wake Forest Law’s Legal Analysis, Writing and Research (LAWR), authored “The Practical Obscurity of the Green Screen Terminal: A Case Study on Accessing Jury Selection Data,” which will be published in the The American Journal of Trial Advocacy in Fall 2017. The article received the 2017 American Association of Law Libraries (AALL)/LexisNexis Call for Papers award.

The article is part of a series of papers that discuss jury selections “by providing a positive, personal account with field data on how litigants pick a jury,” specifically focusing on the challenges of acquiring historical data of jury selection outcomes. As a collaborator in the Wake Forest Law Jury Sunshine Project, Johnson discovered these challenges in data acquisition in legal, technological and organizational capacities. Her article offers innovative research techniques to combat these obstacles and provides insight on potential reasons as to why the government permitted these public records go dormant. This article is a part of a larger bed of legal scholarship by Professors Ron Wright, Kami Chavis and Gregory Parks who will further discuss the findings of this data through the Jury Sunshine Project.

Johnson is also the author of the Wake Forest Law Review article, “LexisNexis Risk Management v. N.C. A.O.C.: How the N.C. Supreme Court Gutted Open Access in 2016,” which she presented alongside her article on accessing jury data at the Cornell Law Library Speaker Series in April 2017. The article addresses LexisNexis Risk Management v. N.C. A.O.C. and how it affects researchers looking to explore N.C. public records data in the aggregate. As an interim solution, Johnson suggests “budgeting for and implementing a new data management system in order to bring the N.C. Clerk’s offices into a digital age.”

Johnson’s teaching and scholarship are concentrated in the areas of the use of technology in the legal academy, outreach services provided by libraries, and teaching practice-centered legal research.

Remembering Porter B. Byrum (JD '42)

By Elaine Tooley

Porter B. Byrum (JD '42), an attorney, businessman, philanthropist and Wake Forest alumnus from Charlotte, North Carolina, died on March 27. He was 96.

No person has been a more generous benefactor to Wake Forest than Byrum, whose lifetime giving totaled more than $50 million. In 2011, he donated to Wake Forest $40 million, the largest gift in the institution's history, with the sale of the Park Road Shopping Center in Charlotte. His generosity spanned the course of decades, and because of him, hundreds of students were afforded the same opportunity for a quality Wake Forest education that he had.

"Wake Forest has lost a loyal friend in Porter Byrum," said Wake Forest President Nathan O. Hatch. "His generosity demonstrates his belief that perseverance can overcome seemingly insurmountable obstacles, that education equals opportunity and that helping others is the key to a meaningful and well-lived life."

To follow Byrum's personal history is to journey with a member of the "Greatest Generation." One of five sons who grew up in a minister's home during the Depression, he received scholarship assistance to attend college and law school at Wake Forest College, then located near Raleigh, which he viewed as the transformational event of his life. After earning his degree in 1942, he was sent to Europe with the Army, where he fought under General George Patton in the Battle of the Bulge. After trudging across Germany in the snow, Byrum was among those with the task of liberating the Buchenwald concentration camp. His service continued in Korea, where he was part of the U.S. military government after the Japanese were expelled.

When he returned from the battlefield to Charlotte in the early 1950s, he made a living as an attorney solving problems creatively and seeking solutions that assisted his clients with smart business deals. For 60 years, Byrum practiced law in the way he thought best and allocated time to projects of his own choosing. He never charged an hourly fee; billing was dependent on the actual help he offered. Work was not driven by money; for Byrum, his purpose was to make a difference helping others in the spirit of Pro Humanitate—a lesson he learned from his father, a Wake Forest alumnus, and his own time at the University.

One of his earliest projects was the Park Road Shopping Center, the first open-air shopping center developed in Charlotte. In 1967, he purchased the center and actively managed it until 2011 when he gave it to Wake Forest University, Wingate University and Queens University of Charlotte.

Another early client needed help closing the purchase of some aircraft equipment with the government. In Byrum's assessment, the deal was a good one, and he invested some of his own money into it. This started his 50-year association with Charlotte Aircraft Corporation and his global travels dealing in airplanes.

Aside from his professional career, he gave time to his alma mater. At Wake Forest, Byrum was a member of the Law Board of Visitors, a recipient of the Carroll Weathers Award—the Law School's highest honor—and a recipient of the Distinguished Alumni Award.

"Porter was passionate about higher education and became an ardent supporter of the law school both as a member of the Law Board of Visitors and as generous benefactor," Dean Suzanne Reynolds (JD '77) says.

In 2001, he established the Porter B. Byrum Athletic Scholarship and, in 2007, he created the Porter B. Byrum Scholarship, providing financial assistance for law students to attend Wake Forest. He also set up an undergraduate scholarship fund in 1993, the John Thomas Byrum Scholarship, to honor his father, the man who championed education and lived to see all five of his sons earn their undergraduate degrees.

Hundreds of Wake Forest students have received scholarships funded by Byrum. Wake Forest's admissions and welcome center was named for Byrum in 2011 and his portrait hangs near the entranceway.

In a 2011 Charlotte Observer editorial, President Hatch wrote, "[Porter Byrum] will forever be remembered at Wake Forest University as a loyal friend, grateful for the gift of education and committed to granting young people the opportunity that he was given so many years ago. His legacy lives in the lives of the next generation of leaders."

Wake Forest has dedicated a remembrance site with Byrum's story, a photo gallery and a guestbook at porterbyrum.wfu.edu.

KIM STEVENS (JD '92)

NEVER STOP LOOKING

Kimberly Stevens (JD '92) once worked for six months without much success to establish a rapport with a man accused of murder. One day she asked him to describe his earliest memory.

“He told me about being shut inside a garbage can with the lid on and hearing the garbage truck coming to get him,” she said. “I asked him how old he was. He said 3.”

Stevens has spent more than 20 years, mostly in North Carolina, working on more than 40 capital cases. Piecing together her clients' life stories often meant untangling years of abuse, family dysfunction and generational poverty.

Since 2015, Stevens has been one of two capital resource counsel attorneys for federal capital trial cases across the United States. It's easier to see the good in some clients than in others, but she never stops looking.

“You come at it from heart and courage,” she explained. “It's a challenge to find the good in someone that society is poised to kill. That's our mandate and we have to do that because life is sacred.”

Stevens most recently served as co-counsel to Dylann Roof, whose case is on appeal in the shooting deaths of nine members of the Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston, South Carolina.

She was drawn to criminal defense work as an undergraduate at Washington State University, where she volunteered with juvenile public defenders and was inspired by the difference they made in their young clients' lives.

When it was time to apply to law schools, Wake Forest Law rose to the top of her list and solidified Stevens' interest in criminal defense. Professor Charley Rose's criminal law class was a favorite, Dean Suzanne Reynolds (JD '77) impressed her with her openness and a criminal procedure class taught by Professor Rhoda Billings (JD '66) reinforced Stevens' belief in the importance of a public defender's work in upholding the Constitution.

Professor Carol Anderson identified Stevens' potential as a trial lawyer, referring to Stevens as a diamond in the rough and placing her on the National Trial Team.

Stevens has kept her ties to Wake Forest Law by returning to coach the trial teams—which won the national title this year at the Student Trial Advocacy Competition in April in Cleveland—for a number of years.

“The faculty at Wake Forest taught us to be responsible, to be a good citizen, to return calls, to be kind, to be ethical,” she said, “but above all, to believe in ourselves.”

Stevens was practicing at Womble Carlyle in 1997 when she took on John Daniels’ defense pro bono. Daniels was accused of strangling his elderly aunt.

“I loved the constitutional law and the investigation and putting the case together,” she said.

Hours before Daniels was to be executed in 2003, a psychiatrist asked then-Gov. Mike Easley for clemency because prosecutors never gave Stevens medical records about Daniels’ history of depression and brain damage from alcohol and cocaine use. The doctor learned of those records after Stevens unearthed the missing paperwork and gave it to her.

“When it’s your client, it affects you in ways you can’t describe,” Stevens said. “Often, they’ve changed through the years.”

Easley didn’t change his mind and Stevens had to tell her client there was no hope. They hugged and cried. Stevens was among those who watched the execution. “When you save a life, when you can participate in that happening, that keeps you going the next day,” she said. “The losses are almost not survivable.”

Stevens has negotiated life sentences for other clients including Demario James Atwater, who kidnapped and shot to death Eve Carson, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill student body president, and Quincy Allen, a South Carolina man, who in 2002, shot to death two men at a Surry County convenience store.

Stevens brings a rare combination of curiosity and compassion to the relationships she develops with her clients, says Professor Mark Rabil, director of the law school’s Innocence and Justice Clinic, who has worked with Stevens on six capital cases that ended in plea deals for life.

“She has a way of seeing through them to the original core of who they were,” he said. “People weren’t born this way. They may or may not have genetic propensities for addiction or mental illness, but most people are not born evil. They’re essentially just people, kids, who come into environments that you try to reconstruct. Kim’s expert at that.”

For Stevens, who calls capital defense work a lawyer’s highest calling, such cases require complete dedication.

“I’ll do all I can for a client whose life demands it,” she said. “You can’t rest until you’ve unturned all of the stones.”

WHEN YOU SAVE A LIFE, WHEN YOU CAN PARTICIPATE IN THAT HAPPENING, THAT KEEPS YOU GOING THE NEXT DAY.

CORENA NORRIS-MCCLUNEY (JD '00)

"I KNOW YOU'RE THINKING,
⚡ IT'S JUST DOUGHNUTS,
HOW COMPLEX
CAN IT BE? ⚡"

Indulging in a hot, glazed Krispy Kreme doughnut is a sweet reminder of success for Corena Norris-McCluney (JD '00). As vice president and general counsel of the Winston-Salem-based Krispy Kreme Doughnuts, she faces the unique challenges of helping run an international business on a daily basis.

"I know you're thinking, 'It's just doughnuts, how complex can it be?'" Norris-McCluney asked a group of Wake Forest Law students. "A lot goes into it, and it's more than just producing doughnuts. We're in 31 countries with 13,500 stores, consumer-packaged goods and licensing. Each day, you never know what you're going to get."

Norris-McCluney spoke as part of the Business Law Program's Sager Speaker Series on April 5, hosted by Professor Omari Simmons, the program director. The speaker series is named for Thomas Sager (JD '76), former vice president and general counsel for Dupont Co., and current partner at Ballard Spahr LLP.

"We hit the jackpot," Simmons said during his introduction. "I think, as with a lot of our speakers, she reflects the

THE SWISS ARMY
KNIFE OF THE LEGAL PROFESSION.”

— PROFESSOR OMARI SIMMONS

highest ideals of the legal profession. Beyond being an avid professional, she is a wonderful person. My previous words don't begin to speak to her commitment to the profession, to the community and to you as students.”

A native of North Carolina, Norris-McCluney graduated from North Carolina State University before attending Wake Forest Law. She practiced with Kilpatrick Townsend LLP, a full-service international law firm, for nearly 12 years in Winston-Salem. During that time, she was awarded the North Carolina Bar Association's Citizen Lawyer Award for her work arranging the Stories of Excellence luncheon series, which featured inspiring speakers sharing their stories of success with fifth-graders at Cook Elementary School. Norris-McCluney also provides volunteer leadership to the Carolina Tide Basketball Organization and Crisis Control Ministry, YMCA of Northwest North Carolina Metropolitan, Heartstrings Pregnancy and Infancy Loss Support Group, St. Paul United Methodist Church and the Winston-Salem Foundation.

“Working at a law firm gave me an opportunity to quickly learn what I didn't want to do,” Norris-McCluney said. “It gave me an opportunity to work in a lot of different areas and it prepared me for things I would do later in my career.”

After joining Krispy Kreme in 2014, she realized the considerable differences between working at an outside law firm and being on the general counsel for a corporation.

“You have to know how your legal knowledge impacts the business,” Norris-McCluney said. “You have to know the business just as well as a traditional business person. (Krispy Kreme) isn't just looking for legal advice, they're expecting us to work magic. Having a seat at the table gives us an opportunity to prevent them from mis-stepping, where at an outside law firm you only get the reactive call.”

As large corporations begin establishing general counsels, the legal profession is shifting to accommodate business and legal needs.

“The emergence of general counsels is probably one of the most significant transformations of the legal profession over the past half century,” Professor Simmons said. “Many observers would call general counsel the Swiss Army knife of the legal profession.”

Norris-McCluney values practical problem solving and an understanding of business needs when hiring services from outside law firms.

“I look for diversity because I want a law firm that has diversity of thought. If it's the same people telling me the same thing, that's not helpful to me. I need different opinions, and I need options.”

An Unforgettable Experience

Two groups of Wake Forest Law alumni became some of the newest members of the Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States at two in-court admissions ceremonies in November 2016 and May 2017. Dean Suzanne Reynolds (JD '77), a member of the Supreme Court Bar, acted as movant, stating that applicants met the requirements for admission.

“What a memorable event for Wake Forest Law graduates and their guests,” Reynolds said. “If you haven’t participated, be sure to put this on your professional bucket list.”

Professor John Korzen (JD '91) also acted as movant to former student and colleague, Katherine Henry (JD '98), at the May event. “Moving to admit my good friend Katie Henry to the Supreme Court Bar was an unforgettable experience,” Korzen said.

Both admissions ceremonies featured non-argument sessions where the Supreme Court reaffirmed prior case decisions. At the May session, the high court affirmed the ruling of the Fourth Circuit that North Carolina’s redistricting plan violated the Constitution.

After court adjourned, both groups were surprised with a brief visit from Associate Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, who shared her congratulations and a brief history lesson.

The next Wake Forest Law-sponsored Bar of the Supreme Court of the U.S. admissions trip is planned for March 3-4, 2019. Interested alumni are encouraged to contact Karleigh King at kingkj@wfu.edu for more information.
